Hi Emily,
I've been sitting on this email trying to figure out where my thoughts lie....and as I sit here typing up a rejection for another worthy manuscript simply because it's paranormal and doesn't feel fresh, I think that has clarified my thoughts. In terms of positioning books in-house, paranormal isn't feeling like something to really swing the bat for. I think that's where I am.

Hi Laura,

Well, if it's not going to be an acquisition, this is just about the nicest kind of letter to get! Thanks. The author and I were brainstorming about this book. We do realize it's a tough sell in today's market, but were wondering if you and your team might find it more marketable if the vampires weren't vampires and the werewolves weren't werewolves. Both of these creatures were based on various elements of Celtic and Egyptian mythology and with some easy changes, could easily be more elemental in form and less typical of what we think of when we think paranormal these days. If you think these types of changes might be exciting, let me know and perhaps we can talk further. But if you think this book is just too paranormal to work now, not to worry, Lynne is working on a really fun contemporary right now and we'll definitely send it your way. I only ask because we love this book and hate to give up on it because of (understandably) strong market pressure.
